Deficiencies of the X-chromosomal genes encoding the growth factors ectodysplasin (EDA) and the ectoderm-derived basement membrane glycoproteins (MUC1 and MUC4) cause X-linked hypohidrotic ectodermal dysplasia (XLHED). Despite the considerable morbidity of the disease in males, few studies have addressed cognitive impairment in children with XLHED. We assessed the neuropsychological outcome of 23 children with XLHED and 20 normal controls matched for age and education. The XLHED group showed significantly poorer performance on verbal and nonverbal memory and on learning and verbal tests, which is consistent with the recent finding of significant deficits in verbal memory in adolescent boys with XLHED. The pattern of cognitive deficits was similar to that observed in children with other X-linked mental retardation syndromes and cerebral palsy, although it was less severe than that found in children with tuberous sclerosis. We conclude that cognitive deficits are an important component of the morbidity of XLHED. Although the neuropsychological profile in XLHED is similar to that of other X-linked mental retardation syndromes, the pattern of cognitive deficits is milder than that observed in other X-linked mental retardation syndromes.
