In either case, Mill did not take a view on the matter. This is partly because he was an empiricist, but also because his own doctrine of the way in which appearances are true to reality is complex. Mill did not endorse any picture of experience: he argued that the senses give us a body of knowledge that we come to know through active inference; and he certainly did not think that these appearances are true to reality in the way that a subjectivist like James thinks they are. He argued instead that the body of truth is supplied by the imagination, in which we construct and represent the external world as having certain appearances. Mill's view, like James', is therefore very complicated. But this is not to deny that Mill did endorse the view that appearances are true to reality. His view was complex, but it is consistent with such a view. 29Briefly, the Problem of Perception is the puzzle of how we can have intuition, and it is a puzzle because on any account, intuition must be either a necessary or a contingent feature of perception, but
