Osteoporotic fractures are common and highly costly health problems. The International Osteoporosis Foundation (IOF) is one of the major worldwide stakeholders in osteoporosis. As such, its members need to address this serious public health problem. In this review, we aim to highlight the major recommendations of the IOF and other relevant organisations on primary care provision and treatment and prevention of osteoporotic fractures. There is considerable evidence that primary care provision leads to more fracture reduction compared with hospital-based fracture treatment and preventive measures. Dose-rate effects on micronucleus frequency in human peripheral blood lymphocytes. In a previous study in human peripheral blood lymphocytes, it was demonstrated that an in vitro exposure to protracted radiation can induce significant numbers of micronucleated cells at doses much lower than those producing cytogenetic damage. We report here dose-rate studies on the induction of micronuclei in vitro in human peripheral blood lymphocytes. A clastogenic/carcinogenic dose of 1.5 Gy was delivered at 0.074 Gy/h, 0.32 Gy/h, 0.92 Gy/h and 3.05 Gy/h. The results demonstrate that the number of cells with micronuclei is dependent on dose-rate and that 1.5 Gy at 0.32 Gy/h is equivalent to 2.0 Gy at 0.074 Gy/h. The frequency of micronucleated cells in the control samples after 0.7, 2.1 and 3.1 Gy is 0.93 +/- 0.5, 0.33 +/- 0.08 and 0.13 +/- 0.03 respectively, in a dose range where a sharp threshold-like behaviour was found. This study suggests that an in vitro exposure of human lymphocytes to a protracted dose of X rays may provide a useful model for evaluating the risk to human health of high dose rate exposure.
