I've decided to use a Pattern-matching-based macro. To my surprise, I noticed that type arguments need to be included in typed lambda expressions (I tried lambdas without those type arguments and it didn't seem to work). So, for example, this works fine: val x = func(1)(2)(3) println(x) But this doesn't work: val x: String = func(1)(2)(3) println(x) Can someone help me understand why this works and that it's not possible to use typed lambda expressions without the type argument? A: Lambdas are, by default, unbound, therefore you don't need to give them a type. Your snippet binds x to a String. The "t" parameter in def func(t: String): String = { is a type parameter of the function. To properly declare your macro, the type parameter t has to be visible to the macro tool, so you need val x = (func _)(1)(2)(3) Q: Syntax for using a file as a macro in a directory? I am trying to use a file as a macro in a directory. The file I am trying to use contains the following: #!/bin/bash cd ~/hearts/test3 echo $HOME echo " RUN wget RUN wget RUN wget RUN./install.sh " I would like to be able to use this file as a macro that can be run in a directory by running a script like this: sh./hearts/utills.sh lives So, I have been following the advice at: and have been able to use it as a
