Sony's PlayStation Now service has been criticised by the original developer of Doom, who says he will no longer approve patches for the service because of a lack of communication from Sony. Doom creator John Carmack criticised PlayStation Now in a post on social networking site Twitter, saying that he had lost the trust of Sony. "I no longer want my name attached to a product being released without my consent," he said. "As per my comment below, I will not approve patches for @PlayStation Now until there is a reasonable discussion." Carmack's criticism follows an announcement earlier this week that the PlayStation Now beta would be closed on 31 January. It had previously said that Sony had extended the beta "while we continue to work to resolve the technical issues." It's unclear what issues have been identified. A spokesman for Sony told GamesIndustry International that it couldn't discuss issues with PlayStation Now. Carmack now confirms on his Twitter account that he was discussing "four different 'technical issues' with @PlayStation during beta that ended up delaying it". "Sadly, three of those have since been resolved," he says. "One was a major blocker." "I don't want to be more specific," he adds. "I want to give them the chance to work to earn my trust back." The beta started with a demo of the game running on the PS4. However, the demo was soon taken down, while the service itself started up late on Tuesday, 23 January. "I'm ashamed to tell people this, but @PlayStation may not have told you about it until now," reads a message on the PlayStation blog that now links to an FAQ about PlayStation Now. "We're planning to offer PS Now on PS3 and PS4 on February 6, 2015 at no additional cost. There will be free PS4 software demos as well." As for the PlayStation Now update itself, that is due to be offered for download on Monday, 27 January. "Once we've closed the beta, we'll also provide an update to the service on Monday, 27 January," the PlayStation blog says. "This will include a host of 3e33713323
