Tuberculosis remains one of the world's most deadly infectious diseases, with 10 million new cases and 1.6 million deaths in 2008. The emergence of multidrug-resistant and extensively drug-resistant strains of Mycobacterium tuberculosis highlights the urgent need to develop new and improved drugs to treat these complex infections. Here, we present a current overview of the state of drug development to treat tuberculosis and highlight the role of natural products in the discovery of new anti-tuberculosis (anti-TB) compounds. In particular, we describe the discovery of the potent diarylpiperazine nitazoxanide, a new agent that has shown efficacy in the treatment of experimental M. tuberculosis infections in animal models, as well as the identification of the active metabolite of linezolid, OPC-67683, a highly active agent that has shown the ability to shorten the duration of tuberculosis treatment.
