Judging from various comments I received at that time, the biggest problem with such a program is that while it might help some people, the heavy-breathing, gum-chewing syndrome never seems to be affected. But let's suppose for a moment that a man is actually damaged by heavy breathing. In that case, he has two choices: take the damage, or make other changes to improve his health. But if he is damaged, why is there some presumption that he would decide to do nothing? If the medical community is correct, and the damage is real, why is there not at least some treatment? I've been to the doctor's many times and he always gets a little bit of my breath (or more, if I'm not being careful) checked for stuff -- and I don't even think it gets done more than twice a year. Just once, for me, in the last 5 years. (I had a cold last week and was coughing -- but they didn't even check my breath there.) Of course, I have had things checked that turned out to be completely imaginary -- but usually there were other symptoms to back them up. The questions I have, though, are: 1) What has been proven to actually be harmful? 2) Has there ever been an adequate trial of some of the things that are thought to be harmful? 3)

Has there ever been a trial where the benefits outweighed the harms? 4) Are there "doses" where the benefit is zero or less than zero? (Note: (4) would apply to cigarettes as well.) If you're one of those people who react to your own breath (or desire to do so), I would suggest you try to follow in the footsteps of those who must endure such a condition. That may be technically for purposes of suicide prevention, since you could end up in the emergency room. If you don't manage it successfully, you'll end up dead, if not of suicide, then of some other respiratory disease. If I had the choice of two evils (self-harm or death), I would hope that I could choose to live and avoid death. A possible preventive of suicides is to consider that the means of taking someone's life could be forgotten. I've seen several suicides

N-terminal histidine-tag enhances protein expression and purification of recombinant heavy chain of dengue type-2 virus E-protein. Recombinant dengue virus vaccines are the most attractive candidates for preventing dengue virus infections. In the present study, we developed and evaluated for the first time the N-terminal histidine-tag (His-tag) strategy to express recombinant dengue virus E-protein using the baculovirus/insect cell expression system. We showed that the truncated His-tag-coding sequence (E $\Delta$ H/6His-tag) integrated into the E-protein open reading frame caused truncation or deletion of 3 amino acids in the C-terminal region of E-protein. The recombinant His-tagged E-protein (E/6His-tag) was expressed in Sf9 cells in a soluble form and the molecular size of the His-tagged E-protein (E $\Delta$ H/6His-tag) was larger than that of the non-tagged recombinant E-protein (E). The removal of the C-terminal sequence of E-protein led to the accumulation of more E-protein in the cytosol. These results suggest that the C-terminal region of E-protein is required for correct folding of the E-protein, and the N-terminal histidine tag caused truncation of E-protein. Furthermore, using an expression vector with the 6His-tag sequence under the control of the strong polyhedrin promoter in Sf9 cells, the recombinant E/6His-tag was obtained at high levels (10% of total cellular protein). In addition, the recombinant E/6His-tag was purified from the soluble fraction of Sf9 cells with a nickel-affinity column. The results showed that the His-tag is useful for enhancing the expression and purification of the recombinant E-protein.
