University of Vermont student Cammi Brummitt's dreadlocks — one of the first hair-dos in the United States — earned her a $1,000 prize after she entered a competition run by the hairstylist who created the style. “I was barely 19 years old, and no one had ever heard of dreads,” Brummitt told Good Morning America. “And I had just gotten off of the bus from a month of snowboarding in Maine — it was super cold, I had been partying all weekend, and when my hair was dry, I got on the bus with wet dreads.” But 30 minutes after getting out of the shower, a classmate told her, “You’re not going to the homecoming dance with wet hair,” she told GMA. “And I was like, ‘I don’t care. For one, it's a complicated look, and Brummitt admits she's not the best at maintaining it. “I just try to take good care of it,” she said, adding that she switched to a new hair product last year to help with the upkeep. “Once you wash it, you have to wash it every three days and at least three times a
