Gathering data is a problem facing any industry that manufactures and/or trades in a three-dimensional product. For example, the auto manufacturing industry has to gather data to account for and/or monitor possible defects in products. In the medical industry, medical professionals must gather data for educational and training purposes, as well as for real-time patient treatment. Still further, the insurance industry must gather data and map out possible causes of loss of a property. In the construction industry, data must be gathered to ensure that three dimensional concrete structures have been properly installed. In the domain of medical products, for example, numerous products are now manufactured that include, for example, a stereotaxic head device that is used to identify areas of the brain on an MRI (magnetic resonance imaging) scan. The process of identifying brain areas in a patient's head is known as neuronavigation, and is used to successfully target a brain area for brain surgery or neurosurgical procedures. Neuronavigation helps one to map various points on a patient's brain in three dimensions, and then program the surgery or procedure to the intended target by implanting small, radio-opaque markers at various locations. The points are programmed into a computer and the surgeon navigates or tracks the points and performs surgical procedures with the aid of the computer. Of particular interest in the domain of neuronavigation are conventional MRI machines that can capture images of a patient's head from different views, such as from the front, left, and right sides, the top and bottom of the head. Once a three-dimensional "map" of the patient's head is made, the surgeons can place tiny radio-opaque markers in various locations on the head. The markers can be placed in one of two ways. In one method, the surgeon first takes an MRI and 3e33713323
