Movie.Biosimilars:

Realistic expectations
or unrealistic hopes?

Biosimilars are highly complex biotechnology drugs, which are aimed to mimic the biological activity of a reference biologic agent in terms of structure, mechanism of action and distribution within the body. To fully understand their development,

scientific and
regulatory expectations, as well as practical obstacles
are to be considered.
In the current article,
we attempt to explain
the principal factors that determine the time from clinical approval until launch of a biosimilar, from the technological aspect, through to the clinical proof of concept. Such proof is the most important component for clinical validation of a biosimilar, thus, the availability of a structure-based non-clinical information may speed-up their development. Within the clinical validation process, a pre-launch document is composed, which must contain all of the components that are important for the launch of the product, from clinical to quality assurance points of view. A validated product is then compared with the reference biologic agent, and/or its reference standard at several points of the comparison procedure. However, a rigorous comparison of safety and efficacy is only one part of the assessment, it is actually not intended as a substitute for the comprehensive development of a biosimilar. Rather, it is expected that a validated product

.Q: How to dynamically create and assign a dataframe to a shiny inputfield depending on the value selected in a radio group I'm trying to create a shiny app that will dynamically assign a dataframe in R to either a radio button or text input. The dataframe is the result of the following code: `library(tidyverse) df %>% mutate(Sample = rownames(.)) %>% group_by(Sepal.Length, Species) %>% summarise(Min = min(Sepal.Length, Species)) %>% as.data.frame()` So, it contains three columns (Sepal.Length, Species and Min) for the iris data set. The radio group is a column with species names, and the text input is a column with a variable to be tested against the radio group (ie. Species). I would like to use some coding such as this: `df %>% mutate(Sample = rownames(.)) %>% group_by(Sepal.Length, Species) %>% summarise(Min = min(Sepal.Length, Species)) %>% as.data.frame()` server
