Users can edit a row in the database and then they check out a version with the data in the locked column changed. Users need to view the data in the locked column in the report as it does not show that it is locked for editing. It is for password protected reports and multiple users using the same report. I have searched and most seem to focus on protecting the data table from editing or using separate tables which is not what I am looking for. Is there anyway to lock a column so users cannot edit that column and then when they check out their version all they see is the existing data? A: Don't use locking for your report. Use a version field instead. Read up on using version fields for Access. Then your report just locks the version of the data.
