

FIFA 22 introduces "HyperMotion Technology," a FIFA experience that uses motion capture data collected from real-life players playing a complete, high-intensity football match in motion capture suits to power gameplay and player movements. To get you into the head of the competitive gamer, EA has detailed the specific technical breakthroughs that made the technology work so well, and the science behind the data integration and processing that turns the biological movements of real-life players into actions on the pitch in real-time. FIFA, Realism, Not Live-Streaming Before the release of FIFA 20 a few months back, we had already seen FIFA launch numerous FIFA titles. It has gone by the mantra of "it's not an official game until it can be streamed on Twitch." For whatever reason, EA decided it wanted to move away from the Twitch requirement. It made sense — FIFA is the biggest video game around, and Twitch is the biggest place to watch these games. But FIFA had been doing this for years, and it was starting to feel like EA was straying from their own game's DNA. For FIFA 21, EA made a new decision to instead dedicate a playable beta version to FIFA with a Twitch option, but it was nowhere to be found at launch. While this is a good decision, it's something that needed to be done, and it still feels like it's been a bit of a cop-out. The rationale behind this decision was that FIFA 20 wasn't launching for months, and EA was choosing to use real, professional players in their in-game practices instead of automated AI, which gave them the competitive advantage that they wanted. This was a clever move, but it's different than taking a big technical leap and really making a change, and a change for the better. With FIFA 22, we're finally getting exactly the type of FIFA game that I've always wanted. Timed ball control is so fantastic in FIFA, but the player movements just weren't very authentic. With the new HyperMotion tech, the realistic player movement is on par with what we had to look forward to in FIFA 18 and FIFA 19. FIFA 22 is going all in with its realism. Using data captured from 22 real-life players playing a complete, high-intensity match in motion capture suits, FIFA 22 gives us a rich and authentic ball experience that puts you directly into
